The work supported on rule of law is often narrowly focussed on a particular 'theme' e.g. terrorism, human trafficking, corruption. The more holistic rule of law work that will result in the required institutional change - as opposed to training individuals which does not build institutional memory - is yet to be fully recognised, understood and funded.

I actually doubt "decent work" will come into it, but economic growth will always be seen as key. It may not be clear, but I don't agree with this way of seeing the world. There is no way that rich states will do anything more than continue to make token gestures towards eliminating basic threats like hunger, poverty and inequality. The states most affected by those are so caught up in an unequal global framework that they will continue to eat themselves from the inside.
